SPORTING MATTERS

BY PETER JACK

WHAT could be better craic than walking for a week, in a beautiful part of the world, with great company? That's what I was up to last week as 11 of us took on a section of the world famous "Camino Frances."

by road) from the south the Basque country. west tip of France to called Santiago near the Atlantic Ocean.

The old name of the lames.

The numbers now attempting it, or even part of it, are colossal. Over a quarter of a million souls from all over the world tackled it last

This year their numbers were swollen by 10 from Limavady and one from Magherafelt. We were being led from Limavady by Brian McNulty who along with John McCloskey and a few others had done sections of the route before.

cheap from Dublin to Biarritz and the return shops even sold walking would be from Bilbao sticks and wet weather which stage we hoped to have experienced some of the life of a Camino traveller.

When John Bunyan "Pilgrim's Progress," I don't think he envisaged luxury hotel accommodation and three course meals for 12 Euros and great local wine, but hey, if that's what it takes to be a pilgrim these days, then I would happily give it a lash!

Although we would be walking from the France to the red and yellow of Spain, the predominant colours

The route in total is along the way were the 776km (nearly 800km red, green and white of

We were in the the North West tip of Catalan region, a fierce-Spain ending in a place ly proud area which is searching for independence from Paris and Madrid. The signs were route is the way of St in French - and Catalan when we arrived.

> Although our flight was delayed for two hours our driver was still there, thanks to Brian, to take us on the windy road through the valley past a crashing river to the picturesque town of San Jan Pied de Port close to a cathedral, river, ramparts, castle etc.

It is no wonder that France has more tourists than anywhere else in the world.

Despite its popularity as the gateway to the The flights were Camino, prices were very reasonable. Lots of gear - we hoped we wouldn't need either.

> We all trotted along eagerly to the Office de Pelerin for our Pilgrims passport. This is a document which would get stamped at least twice a day on your route.

We showed our own passports and we received a carte d'identite which we proudly put in our rucksacks.

We also picked up some shells which we red, white and blue of to denote the journey embarking.

he Camino trances

(conche in French) was on t-shirts, fridge mag-

the day, was a moor slaver but he now has a softer image but, he had today and we plumped probably no idea that a for the route Napoleon thousand years later, hundreds of thousands of Pilgrims would be fol- Peninsular War. lowing his footsteps.

more benign figure and it is said that he finished his own Pilgrimage in Santiago and that is why millions of people have her own Pilgrimage. followed in his footsteps ever since.

trip even more special for saw John McCloskey slip only sky - and some which had a section conme would be the pres- over to her and give her birds. ence of my son, Patrick.

After working in Australia, then a year in Beijing and a year in typical of the generosity Tokyo and 6 months in of the people on this India and six months in trail. Columbia the young man was coming "home" and for once he didn't have to do any research for this

He has plotted and planned his hikes all over the world but thank fully all he had to do for a would attach to the change was to rock on back of our rucksacks with a rucksack. In the meantime there was a lot upon which we were of hills to conquer – all we had to do was put one The symbol of the foot in front of the other.

shell - or scallop - Day 1 - San Jean a Pied de Porte to Troncvalles

"A journey of 1,000 St James, way back in miles starts with a single step" (LAO TZU). We had two possible routes and his armies took to invade Spain to start the

We had no intention of 1,400 metres. He became a much starting a war, just our journey. At breakfast, we met an 86 year old lady from Melbourne who was about to embark on

She was a sole traveller, but she had lost all offer What would make the her money in the taxi. I some money to help her on her way. This would be typical of John - and

Before we left our first town, I found a boulangerie to grab a baguette, some croissants and some pain au chocalat for

As soon as we left thought we were prey! town, the road went up and kept going up. We had had substantial thunder and lightning and heavy rain during the night, not as bad however as the dreadful flooding which was happening at exactly the same time back in Eglinton.

The road only had a few vehicles which lessened as it weaved its way up hill and changed from a 'B' road to a 'C' road.

You would spot your fellow travellers and you would pass them and they would pass you if you took a breather. As it was very warm, it was important to keep drinking from the fountains of "Eau Potable" that were at the road side.

Our first stop was at a café in the middle of nowhere which appeared out of the mist where we recognised quite a few from our flight the day before.

I even spotted some intrepid cyclists who obviously relished hills. One guy however did pass us on an electric grims. bike! I just wish that I had an engine to help power my legs as we struggled up from an altitude of 200 metres to

The path was very easy to spot, ie a scalloped shell and yellow direction signs were everywhere. Before we knew it, we were above the clouds. There was a carpet of white on either side of us and above us a working monastery

Patrick has been lucky we gratefully entered for enough to walk under the a cold beer and a hot condors of the Andes of shower. South America and I have done the same for the Himalayan eagles of Nepal but now both of us craned our necks to see a flock of hawks wheeling above us - we thought we would keep on walking in case they

An enterprising bloke drove his lorry somehow up here stuffed with food to the top of the pass and never had been so welcome. I took the chance to lie down and stretch my back.

By this stage, the mist out the constant intruand fog had been burnt off as sun reappeared and drips of sweat off my chin now turned into a for all, religious and nonsteady flow and still the path which had now Gentile, old and young, turned rocky, weaved ever remorselessly upwards.

There were flocks of the religious challenge, sheep and horses with bells on their necks similar to the pastoral scenes I had encountered while hiking in the Bulgarian mountains a few weeks ago with my other son

France to Spain without port. any border checks - I thought I would enjoy it while I can before Brexit! talk, but walked the hours.

Earlier, we had seen two massive pigs wandering about the quiet roads as well as the odd cross to remind us of some people who had died up here during their Pilgrimage.

memorial to two locals who had been tortured by the Nazis during the war.

route were there because of the movie, "The Way," staring Martin Sheen and our very own James Nesbitt - I can confirm that the movie was shot on location as it showed a lot of the trail which we encountered.

Day 2 - Roncevalls to Zubiri (21.9K)

We left our luggage down in the fover at 8.30 and by some miracle it was all transported for us to our next port of call. Brian organised this through his contact, Victoria, who runs a Pilgrims' Travel Company.

Victoria booked us in an amazing array of hostels hotels, and B & B's where all the hard work was done for us all we had to do was walk from A to B every

Patrick and I drifted off the front of our group by default but there was no danger of us getting lost due to the amount of fellow pildown section just to give

There was a steep hill

This was a reminder that while going uphill is harder on the lungs,

going downhill is harder

schedule, at a one horse

town called Roncevalls

which was our base for the night. This was both

verted to a hotel which

The Church where we went for a Pilgrims'

blessing later that night

(when in Rome etc) was

1,000 years old and beau-

Most - but not all of the walkers have a religious or spiritual reason for putting themselves

hours of purgatory every day and even if you weren't religious you could still be moved by the desire of many who were yearning for a more simpler natural life with-

sions and media overload religious, Jew and

male and female, believer, non-believer etc.

Some were doing it for

This Pilgrimage was of the 21st Century.

tifully lit.

We arrived, ahead of

on the legs.

After posing beside the road sign (Camino de Santiago 790K) we set off on a path beside the main road.

Our route today took the quads a good bash- us on quiet country roads and forest paths that only occasionally criss-crossed the main arterial route. We had a coffee stop in a café which was full of people like us.

We would pass and repass the two girls from Cork, the couple from Slovenia, the bloke from California, Mark from Australia, Conor from Dublin, the Japanese and Korean four etc.

We would always them wish Camino" ie have a good walk, have a safe journey, have a good trip. The Camino has been a boom to the tourist industry in this part of Spain and the authorities realise that to.

The signage through seven or eight superb. You really could not get lost and you really do not need a guide.

Wouldn't it be great if we could have a "Camino Patrick," say on the North Coast? It would start in Derry and make its way over to Ballycastle and then down to Larne.

That would take a good week ie seven bed nights for tourists. You would obviously need a path and we could use parts of the Ulster Way (a route that has been scandalously allowed to fall in to disrepair ever since There was a hostel in Government handed over responsibility to

I once organised a race which involved 39 teams of two running a half marathon along the Ulster Way every This was to ensure that two hours and we fin-

The Ulster Way is an amazing trail just waiting to be reborn. For those seeking the spiritual side of things there would be short Church services at night along the route.

The cafes and shops and restaurants and bars and B & B's would all get a turn out of it because folks, there isn't anywhere nicer than our own North Coast and the Glens of Antrim.

While that remains a pipe dream, meanwhile back on the Camino Santiago, you would drift in and out of conversations as vou moved up and down the path.

We emerged on to a main road where an enterprising local bloke was selling cokes and chorizo sandwiches, which fuelled the machine enough to reach Zubiri by 2.30, again, ahead of sched-

Patrick and I took off our hiking boots gratefully and investigated the local outdoor swimming pool, where a few lengths were swum and a bit of quiet reading was done in the shade.

Our team of eleven met up in one of the only cafes in town for the Pilgrims' menu, eleven Euros for bread, water wine and three courses.

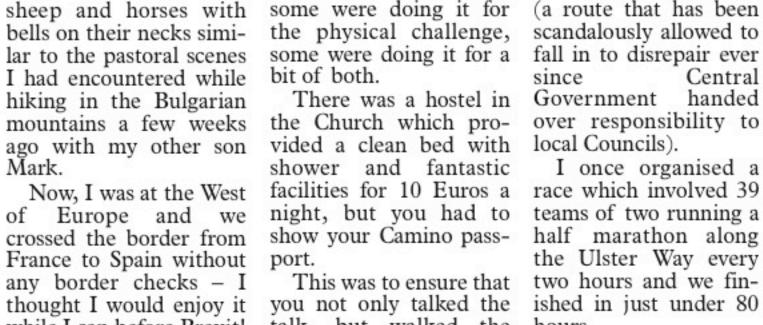

I don't think the Pilgrims of medieval times could frolic in swimming pools and drink wine, but we had suffered six hours walking in 30 degrees to get there!

A journey like this gives you a chance to catch up - and slow down. At home everybody seems in a rush and we confuse motion with progress.

Here, time is measured in days not minutes, distances are measured in kilometres not hundreds of miles. We had travelled just over 20K today on our feet by ourselves and it was hard earned.

We saw the countryside, we appreciated the lizards by the side of the path or the blackcurrents in the hedge or the songs of the birds above us. I am not saying this is for everyone, but it can't do us any harm to slow down once in a while.

Join me next week for the last three days on the journey of the "Camino Frances."

There was also a

Ouite a few on the

Peter in the Basque country. NCL36-13s

Wild horses in the Pyrenees. NCL36-12s

The eleven pilgrims setting off. NCL36-11s